Meet The Chief

Jack Aker has always been in the right place at the wrong time during his baseball career. A ten-year major league pitcher, Aker began with Charley Finley's Kansas City Athletics in 1964 and moved with the A's to Oakland in 1968. But he was not with the A's in the early 1970's during their reign as American League and World Champions, having been selected by the short-lived Seattle Pilots in the 1969 expansion draft.

Aker was excited to be traded from Seattle to the New York Yankees in May of 1969. The Yankees were "class;" it was a dream to wear the pinstripes. Aker became a key man in a bullpen which included Steve Hamilton and Lindy McDaniel. When Sparky Lyle joined the Yankees in the early 1970's the front office decided they could spare Aker. He was shipped to the Chicago Cubs, thus missing being with the Yankees during their glory years in the mid and late '70's.

Aker continued to pitch, solely in relief, for the Cubs, and later for the Atlanta Braves. (Although he appeared in 495 games, he never started a game.) Aker was traded to the New York Mets in 1974, a year after their National League Championship season. This time, Aker, having always been with mediocre teams before they became great teams, was a year too late.

Arm problems and back operations forced Aker to retire as a player after his 1974 season with New York. The Mets gave him a job managing their Class A team in Aker's home town of Visalia, California. In 1976, Aker and the club moved to Lynchburg, Virginia, and in the five seasons that followed, Aker was twice named the Carolina League "Manager of the Year." He brought the Lynchburg Mets to two championships during his reign as manager.

In 1981, Aker was promoted to the Triple-A Tidewater Tides, whom he managed to a third-place finish and a playoff spot. In 1982, he led the Tides to the International League Governor's Cup playoff title, sweeping both Rochester and Columbus to win the championship in six straight games.

But winning isn't always enough. Jack Aker was not the man the New York Mets, under their new ownership, wanted in Tidewater. They let him go to make room for their current New York manager, Dave Johnson.

While managing in the Puerto Rican Winter League, Aker was hired by the Cleveland Indians as the pitching coach for the 1983 Buffalo Bisons. After leading the Santurce Cangrejeros to a first place finish, Aker left for Buffalo to accept his new position.

"I hated to give up managing," Aker said a year later, "but I knew I'd get a chance to manage again. For a while it was enjoyable, in a way, not to have the day-to-day worries that a manager has. I enjoyed concentrating on working with the young pitchers, but I'm definitely much happier managing again, I love to manage. I love the challenge and the excitement. If you can't play the game anymore, managing is the best way to stay in it."

Aker is a quiet man who is most confident and at ease on the baseball field. At 43, he has spent 25 years — all of his adult life — in professional baseball. He signed with Kansas City in 1959 after attending the College of the Sequoias in Visalia, where he grew up and excelled in high school football and baseball.

Of Potawatomie Indian descent, with the nickname of "Chief", Aker jokes about being an Indian, working for the Indians and running the Bisons. "The difference," he said, "is that my ancestors ran the Bisons off of cliffs. I'm going to run these Bisons to the top of the Eastern League." His chewing tobacco, incidentally, is Red Man.

In a quarter-century of baseball, Aker has lived in a score of cities and has played and managed in eighty to ninety more. "In all that traveling, I only saw the cities we played in, and then usually all I saw was the hotel and the ballpark. So last fall, when the season ended, I jumped in a camper and headed across the country. I finally saw all the things I'd always driven by or flown over. Things like Yellowstone, the Grand Canyon and a half dozen other National Parks. I logged ten thousand miles, and really saw some magnificent places. If I ever retire from this game, I may just travel around."

Aker is the father of three: Melinda, 25; Mark, 21; and Matthew, 14. (If just a coincidence their names all begin with "M".) Melinda has two little girls. "I hate to admit I'm a grandfather," said Aker, "but there are few things that give me more joy than my granddaughters." Matthew is just beginning to play high school baseball. "He's grown up in the clubhouse, around the players," says his father. "He knows and loves this game. He's got a great arm. I think he'll make a pretty good pitcher."

Aker's biggest thrills in baseball were seeing Catfish Hunter pitch his perfect game in Oakland in 1968, and being on hand when Hank Aaron hit his 715th home run. The two things I really wanted to do but never got the chance were to make the All-Star Team and to play in a World Series," he said. Aker's best shot at the All-Star Team came in 1966 when he was named the American League "Fireman of the Year," posting 32 saves and a 1.99 ERA. But he was not named to the team.

Managing in the minor leagues is just like playing in the minor leagues; you hope some day to make it to the big leagues.

Jack Aker, the manager, won't be satisfied until he reaches the big leagues for another shot at the All-Star Team and a World Series ring.
